Introduction

The symbiotic process and synergistic interaction between teaching, training and the practice of Rural Development, among other programme management systems, comprise the lifeline of the National and Regional programmes of Rural Development. Institutional capacity building, networking and partnerships between public-public, public-civic and public-private organisations are now seen as the harbingers of 'Change Management' for professionalising the Rural Development institutions and streamlining the development delivery systems. The one-year Post Graduate Diploma in Rural Development Management (PGDRDM) could not have been ushered in at a more appropriate time than now, when the need for Rural Development professionals is considered paramount and the concomitant grooming of talented persons non-negotiable. Developing a cadre of committed, competent and passionate rural development professionals, is therefore, an express challenge and a major mandate for all the Rural Development organisations in general and the National Institute of Rural Development and Panchayati Raj (NIRD&PR), the 'Lead Rural Development and Panchayati Raj Institution' in the country, in particular, It is in this context the UNESCAP has recognised the NIRD&PR as one of the Centers of Excellence in HRD research. The HRD endeavor of NIRD&PR is thus poised to set in motion a series of capacity-building initiatives. The successful mission of the first Nine Batches of PGDRDM is the seedbed for the 12th Batch of PGDRDM that is scheduled to commence from August 2016. 10th and 11th Batches are under progress. The NIRD&PR and the Centre for PG Studies and Distance Education (CPGS&DE) leverage the governmental, civil society and corporate strengths toward building Knowledge Centres, Skill Pools and Development Practitioners' platforms. Similar PG Programmes like the 'Sustainable Rural Development', 'Tribal Development Management' and 'Post Graduate Diploma Programme in Geospatial Technology Applications in Rural Development', are also on offer under Distance mode.

Programme Design

The PGDRDM design rests on the tripod of (i) Rural Development Philosophy, Concepts, Principles, Policies, Programmes and Organisations (ii) Rural Development Management Practices, and (iii) Rural Social Sector. The programme consists of three major components, namely, (a) Classroom teaching and interactive learning (b) Fieldwork (short visits and long visit) and (c) Field Attachment (Rural Organisational Internship). The first component envisages exposure to attitudes, skills and knowledge relevant to the rural society, rural development philosophy and concepts, and rural development management theories and practices. The second one primarily revolves around understanding the rural society, its people, dynamics of interaction, institutions, relationships and livelihoods by way of intensive fieldwork. The last component seeks to equip the students with skills of managing organisations/enterprises through organisational internship for 'hands on learning and applications'.

Programme Duration

One year – August 2016 to July 2017

Programme Framework

The classroom component is offered in the First Trimester (14 weeks); a large part (10 weeks) of the Second Trimester is devoted to classroom followed by eight weeks of rural organizational internship, also called as 'Field Attachment (FA)', and the rest of the Third Trimester (12 weeks) caps up the classroom learning. In effect, the programme envisages twenty five courses with 52.5 credits. The courses and the related field and project work cover the essentials of rural society, economics, people and organisations; good governance; natural and human resource development; rural development management principles and practices; project planning and management; management accounting and financial management; IT and ICT; agro-processing and small and medium rural enterprises; rural organisations; rural credit; micro-finance; rural insurance; livelihoods; rural product marketing; infrastructure; social sector services; development communication; skill development; rural health management and overall quality of life, among others, as listed trimester-wise. Based on the programme design and its objectives, the following courses, as shown in the next page, seek to fulfil the objective of the classroom component that is presented in three parts. Field visits and Field Attachment /Organisational Internship (6 weeks) are interspersed with the classroom component. Other associated academic activities equaling ten weeks duration at different time points include shortfield visits, seminars, workshops, fortnightly forum presentations, special lectures, thematic assignments, quizzes and examinations. Special lectures, exposure visits, panel discussions, games and case studies comprise the pedagogy and learning methodology. Student seminars, theme-specific assignments and project work are expected to further aid the process of self and interactive learning, both in and outside the classroom.

Field Attachment (FA) / Rural Organisational Internship

As part of the PGDRDM curriculum requirement, the students are sent on short and long field visits for field work and field attachment (Rural Organisational Internship) of six weeks at the end of the second trimester in small groups. This component carries a weightage of 2.0 credits. The short field visits of 2-3 days duration numbering 25-30 visits (about 12 weeks) are arranged across the courses throughout the Programme. The short and long field visits of two-three days spread over all the three trimesters provide the students with core development and management insights while imparting analytical skills for planning and managing rural development programmes.

The Six- weeks Field Attachment (Rural Organisational Internship) component seeks to sensitise the students to the hard core problems of the rural society, its dynamics, its realities and institutions. Also, the FA component focuses on Institutions, organisational structures, organisational culture, management systems, HRD, finance, production processes, marketing, value addition, etc. The students, under the guidance of the CPGS&DE Faculty, designated faculty members of other Centres of NIRD&PR, the PGDRDM guest faculty and Heads / Supervisors of the host organisations, are expected to focus on the stated objectives, understand the processes, analyse the outcomes and reflect and report on the overall learning drawn from the FA-Rural Organisational Internship. The FA is scheduled during the period after the end of the second trimester and commencement of the third trimester. Specific learning and application oriented tasks / projects will be generated both by the CPGS&DE and the host organisations for individual or group work. Though the students are given a chance to choose an organisation short-listed by the CPGS&DE for FA, the CPGS&DE reserves the right to attach a student to any organisation considered important from the viewpoint of the objectives of the PGDRDM.
